E, ε, the ſecond vowel, and fifth letter in the Greek alphabet, from the Hebrew ה, to which it anſwers in alphabetical order, and from which it takes its figure: for by turning it to the right hand, to comply with our way of writing, it ſtands thus Γ; and by taking the ſeparate perpending line, and joining it tranſverſe to the foot, that it may anſwer the top line, we eaſily form E. There is indeed another figure of the Greek letter, but later, viz. Є, which our Saxon anceſtors borrowed from them without any variation. This letter was both long and ſhort in the old Greek, as it is ſtill in moſt languages, who pronounce λέγω, and λήγω, though of a quite different ſenſe, and innumerable ſuch words, after the ſame manner; from which ambiguity often ariſeth. To obviate this, and perhaps ſome other inconveniencies, they invented H to expreſs the long ſound, or, to ſpeak more properly, robbed their alphabet of one of its letters, which were but ſixteen, and ſupplied the want of it by a mark of aſpiration, writing ἑθμὸς for HETHMOΣ. But this only could ſupply the want of their baniſhed H in the beginning of their words, therefore they found themſelves under a neceſſity of inventing three letters more to expreſs it in the middle, namely Θ, X, Φ. But of this ſee more in the letter H.

To proceed, this letter E in old Greek was pronounced like ει, as ο was ſounded like ȣ. In Latin, it is changed into, and hath a mutual intercourſe with, all its ſiſter vowels, as they with it; into a, as from ſero, ſatus, reor, ratus; ſo in like manner a into it, as tracto, detrecto; e into i, as emo, eximo, perimo; as in like manner i into e, as eligans was writ by the antients for elegans, as Gellius 11, 2. tells us; and in ſome words theſe vowels are writ indifferently, as heri or here. So Auguſtus and Livy, as we are told by Quintilian, Inſtit. Orat. 1, 7. took the liberty of writing other words, as ſibe and quaſe for ſibi and quaſi, ſuppoſing this way of writing came neareſt to the common pronunciation; for e in Latin, as well as Greek, was pronounced ei; hence the Romans in the three like caſes of the plural number of the third declenſion, writ many, if not all, words indifferently in is, es, or eis, as partis, partes, or parteis; and in the accuſative and ablative ſing. of the ſame declenſion, in many words theſe endings are indifferently uſed, as might be ſhewn by innumerable examples. That e and o are thus interchangeably uſed, is evident in pendo, pondus, tego, toga, and in Greek λέγω, λόγος, τρέπω, τρόπος, ſo in like manner o into e, as from vos is derived veſter; to omit that voſtrum and veſtrum, advorſum and adverſum are read in pure writers. Laſtly, the ſame is alſo obſerved in e and u, u and e, as in percello, perculi, perculſum; juro, dejero, pejero. In the compoſition of diphthongs, e is a prepoſitive only in two words, hei and heu; ſubjunctive after words innumerable in a, as aedes, aeger, &c. Alſo after o in words from the Greek diphthong οι, as οἶστρος, œſtrus, Οἰδίπȣς, Oedipus. In the contracted notes of the antients, E. is put for Eſt, Ennius, Edilis; E. B. Ejus Bona; E. D. Ejus Domus; E. E. Ejus Etas; E. F. Ejus fecit; E. F. vel E. FIL. Ejus filius.

F f Roman, and now in common uſe, F f Ital. which alſo is in modern uſe, 𝔉 𝔣 in old Engliſh, as commonly called, though long after the time of the Saxons, in modern uſe, but chiefly in acts of parliament and proclamations, the ſixth letter in the Hebrew, Latin, and many other alphabets, may ſeem to have loſt its place, and figure in the Greek alphabet now uſed; but however, its place is ſupplied in the numerals by ϛ, which is called Βαῦ ἐπίσημον, and its power of being a vowel, conſonant, and quieſcent letter, which it had in the old Greek alphabet, is ſtill otherwiſe ſupplied. This ſixth Cadmean letter anſwering to ו was firſt turned to the left, as its original, thus, ꟻ, and afterwards to the right F. The Æolians uſed the former way, and turned it upſide down, thus, Ⅎ. Theſe People uſed it before ſoft vowels, writing Ⅎοῖνος for οἶνος; for an aſpirate, as, Ⅎόλος for ὅλος, alſo in the middle of words to ſtop a gap between two vowels, in order to prevent their colliſion, as οℲις for ὄϊς. The old Latins alſo received it from them, only turning it to the right hand, and ſetting it upright as we now uſe it. They, as well as the Æolians, uſed it for h both in the beginning and middle of words, writing fordeum for hordeum, veſo for veho; and ſometimes turned it into v, inſtead of οℲις, writing ovis, thereby ſhewing its affinity to the Hebrew vau. This letter being in the form of two Γ's clapt one upon another, perhaps through the ſupineneſs or ignorance of Grammarians, was, and ſo continues to be, called digamma. Certain it is, there is no affinity between the powers of f and g. In after times, this letter growing into diſuſe among all the Greeks, they cut an o into two parts, the former whereof they clapt upon words which antiently had begun with the letter h, or its ſubſtitute Ⅎ, and the other half upon ſuch as began with a ſoft vowel. The Latins alſo, both in the beginning and middle of words aſpirated, reſumed the old letter h, inſtead of foſtis writing hoſtis, and inſtead of traſo, traho. But though its place and analogous uſe favour its deſcent from the Hebrew vau, yet perhaps as much may be ſaid for its pedigree from the Hebrew פ, and ſo make it difficult to determine in that matter. As to its figure it may be as well formed from ו turning it [illegible] the right hand, and adding the middle declining line, as above; or from the final ף by turning it, and joining to the middle a ſmall line taken from the top; or from the old Greek Ϝ by taking its ſhort leg and joining it to the belly. But when we carefully attend to the ſound and power of this letter, we cannot but obſerve that it comes nearer to the ſound of פ phe, and φ phi, than ve and vi, as our Weſtern people ſound it. And in Latin words of Hebrew extraction, פ is more generally changed into f, than v. Thus from the Hebrew פרא comes the Greek φὴρ, and the Latin fera; from פור, fors; from פוך, fucus, &c. But ſince from what hath been ſaid may be gathered its relation to ו in place, and primitive uſe, and perhaps in its figure, but that in ſound at leaſt it ſeems more nearly related to the Hebrew פ or the Greek Φ, we may conclude it participates of both. And I am inclined to think, that a very probable reaſon may be given from ſuch a concluſion, why the antient Greeks ſo early diſmiſſed this letter; namely, becauſe having otherwiſe ſupplied the uſes it had from the primitive ו, finding its ſound nearly related to their Φ, they concluded they had no farther occaſion for it, and ſo left it out. But whether it comes nearer to v or ph, this is certain, whatever ſome great men may have argued to the contrary, that it is a mute, and of the firſt rank alſo. Nor is it any argument of its being a liquid, that we put e before it, calling it ef, analogous to the liquids el, em, en, er (for ſo by the way we ought to call that letter, not ar, if we would keep to analogy) whereas in the mutes we pronounce e afterwards, as be, ce, &c. For this cuſtom hath no foundation in the nature of the letter itſelf, nor in the Hebrew and Greek tongues, who ſay not ep and eph, but pe and phe, pi and phi; but hath obtained from the hypercriticiſm, perverſeneſs, ignorance, or inadvertency of Grammarians. And indeed, if this cuſtom would prove it a ſemivowel, we muſt alſo adopt s into the family of the liquids, and, what is ſtill more abſurd, make a ſemivowel of two conſonants, whereof at leaſt they confeſs one to be a mute, namely x, which they call ex, juſt with as much reaſon as they call f ef. Beſides, f precedes the liquids l and r in the ſame ſyllable, as in flos, fraus, &c. and ſurely in Latin words two liquids cannot begin a ſyllable. G g Latin, 𝔊 𝔤 in the old black Engliſh letter, as commonly called, in Hebrew ג, in Greek Γ γ, in both which tongues it is the third Letter, was not in uſe amongſt the Romans till about the ſecond Punic war, being firſt introduced by Sp. Carvilius, as Plutarch informs us in his 54th Roman Problem; nor did they then admit it into its third place, invaded by the uſurper c, now ſettled by preſcription: however, they placed it in a good neighbourhood, between its kindred f and h, which, upon occaſion, mutually ſerve each other. But though c may juſtly be called an uſurper with reſpect to its order in the alphabet, we muſt allow it a kind of right, by having been inveſted with the power and ſound of g, For it is certain that the old Romans, who writ pucna and Carthaco, read pugna, and Carthago; otherwiſe, after the admiſſion of g, they would ſtill have retained the priſtine c in theſe and the like words. If any ſhould aſk how the antient Romans could know before this letter g came into uſe, where and in what words to pronounce either ſound? it muſt be anſwered, by uſe alone: For that this might be known ſo, may be exemplified by an hundred inſtances in our own language; to give only one, we are at no loſs how to ſound 𝔱𝔥𝔞𝔱 and 𝔱𝔥𝔞𝔱𝔠𝔥, 𝔱𝔥𝔢 and 𝔱𝔥𝔢𝔪𝔢, 𝔱𝔥𝔦𝔰 and 𝔱𝔥𝔦𝔰𝔱𝔩𝔢, 𝔱𝔥𝔬𝔲 and 𝔱𝔥𝔬𝔲𝔰𝔞𝔫𝔡, 𝔱𝔥𝔲𝔰 and 𝔱𝔥𝔲𝔪𝔟; and innumerable words of this kind. This indeed muſt be owned, that to give ſeveral ſounds to one and the ſame letter, makes any language, and particularly our own, as in the above inſtance, more difficult to be learned, and eſpecially by foreigners. To remedy which inconvenience, the Romans ſeem to have taken in the letter g. And here I cannot but remark how we have acted the reverſe; they took in g, which they had not, to make their own tongue more eaſy, we have laid aſide þ and ȝ which we had, to make ours more difficult, which is very unaccountable.

But to proceed; from the Hebrew ג Gimel, which was emphatically called Gamla, from גמל a camel, becauſe of the bunch on its back, the Greeks gave it the name of Gamma: Some think the Latin G received its figure immediately alſo from the ſame letter; others from the cognate ק, which, when turned to the right, CI much reſembles G. I ſhould think it more probably received its form mediately from the Hebrew ג, I mean from Γ, ſince, as I before obſerved, the letter c originally had the power and ſound of the after invented g, as well as its own; and ſo when the Romans admitted it, they might make it with good reaſon differ no more from c in figure, than in ſound. For indeed theſe Letters differ only thus, c is a ſofter g, as g is an harder c. Hence it comes to paſs, that in declining, the harder g before a vowel is before a conſonant changed into the ſofter c, as lego, legi, lectum, ago, egi, actum, &c. not legtum, agtum, which would be too hard. For this reaſon jungo, rego, tego, &c. in the perfect tenſes, are read before the formative ſ, juncſi, recſi, tecſi, not jungſi, regſi, tegſi; for ſo, if we may believe Iſidor, before the age of Auguſtus ſuch words were uſually writ, not by x: which, being only a more compendious way of writing, made Quintilian ſay, Inſtit. 1, 6. the Romans might have been without it; for they might have continued to write cs, or gs, as recs, apecs. The letter g ſometimes alſo ſeems related to z, as we write indifferently zinziber, and gingiber. The cognation of this letter and c is ſo cloſe, that in ſome words either of them may be uſed; as Caius, or Gaius; Cneus, or Gneus; vigeſimus, or viceſimus, from viginti: and are often changed into each other, for as from viginti, comes viceſimus; ſo from centum, is derived quingenti. In Greek this letter, being in the middle of the ſecond rank of the mutes, is changed not only into κ but χ alſo, as in the ſecond conjugation, conſiſting of this order of the mutes, may plainly be obſerved; as lego, f. lecſo, p. lelecha; inſtead of legſo, lelegha, the harder ſounds. I cannot forbear to obſerve here, that both the Greeks and Romans always, and before all vowels, pronounced this letter hard, ſounding γένος and genus, γίγας and gigas, as we do in 𝔤𝔢𝔱 and 𝔤𝔦𝔟𝔢, never as we do in 𝔤𝔢𝔫𝔢𝔯𝔞𝔱𝔦𝔬𝔫 and ginger; which irregular and uncertain pronunciation of this letter, as well as the cognate c, proves often a great diſcouragement to thoſe who deſire to learn our tongue; and, together with our different ſound of the vowels, makes our Latin, though much purer generally than theirs, almoſt as unintelligible as our Engliſh. In the notes of the antients, G. is put for Gaius, Gellius, gens, genius; GER. Germanus, Germanicus; G. G. Gemina, geſſit, geſſerunt; GA. Galeria, Gallus, Gallia; G. C. H h, Engliſh black letter 𝔥 𝔥, Engliſh Saxon ƕ, which ſeems to have received its figure from its original the Hebrew ח. The Phenicians, moſt antient Greeks, and Romans, uſed the ſame figure with our Engliſh H, which in the ſeries of all their alphabets keeps its primitive place, being the eighth letter. The leſs antient Greeks indeed, not contented that their letter E ſhould denote both the ſhort and long ſounds, as their anceſtors were, witneſs the divine Plato, and his voucher the lately diſcovered Sigean monument, having conſulted to expreſs the long ſound of E, inveſted it with the figure and order of this letter, endeavouring to ſupply the want thereof in their old alphabet by a mark of aſpiration over the head of its vowel, writing ἅμα, ὁδὸς, &c. inſtead of the old Ionic HAMA and HOΔOΣ, endeavouring, I ſay; for though they did it conveniently over a vowel beginning a word, they have quite left it out in the middle, writing Ενοδία and Ταώς, for ENHOΔIA and TAHOΣ; and where it occurred after the letter P, they have attempted it ſomewhat prepoſterouſly for PHAMNOΣ, PHHTOP, ΠYPPOΣ, &c. writing Ῥάμνος, Ῥήτωρ, Πυῤῥος, where the mark of aſpiration is put before, but ſounded after the conſonant. This extermination by the Greeks, being very antient, probably was the reaſon why ſome of the antient grammarians, and among the reſt our great Maſter Priſcian, have controverted its title to be a letter. One argument againſt it, is, that it is only a pure aſpiration, having nothing to aſſert its right to the elementarian family but the figure, which, if ſufficient, would alſo recommend the numeral notes to the ſame honour. But with due reverence to ſo great a man, that it has a power, and that it had a name alſo in the original, and other the moſt antient dialects thereof, is very evident. Beſides, if its being an aſpiration proves it to be no letter, the original ſofter א and ה, which are often not heard in pronunciation, and the rougher ע and ח the parent of H, muſt be exterminated the Hebrew alphabet: and ſurely he would not have compared h and a numeral mark, had he reflected that the former is an individual part of a ſyllable, the latter the characteriſtic of a whole word, two quite different things. But he inſiſts, "If "it be a letter, it muſt either be a vowel or a conſonant." Yea, certainly. And that it is no vowel, though a conſtant retainer to that family, may be eaſily granted him; nor will we endeavour to evince its being a liquid, as ſome have, from its near approach to the nature of a ſemivowel. But ſure it ought not to be excluded the company of the aſpirated mutes φ, ϑ, χ, which antiently were not in the Greek alphabet, and owe their place there purely to their incorporating with this letter. Surely it would be hard to exclude it. H indeed is no other than an hard aſpirate, veſted with the power of its mother ח, and plainly the ſame as χ, that is, no other than an hard aſpiration; and in many Latin words borrowed from the Greeks, is plainly ſubſtituted for it, as χάλω, halo, χάω, hio, χάμαι, humi, &c. and in Latin michi, nichil, for mihi, nihil; which alſo may be more plain in the formation of Greek verbs ending in the ſecond order of the mutes, which conſtitute their ſecond conjugation, with that of the Latin verbs of the ſame termination; for as πλέκω, λέγω, τρέχω, move into ξ in the future tenſe; ſo dico, lego, veho, move into xi in the perfect tenſe. But others think it no letter, becauſe the Latin Poets generally, and the Greek often, neglect it, treating it as if it were not there at all. This argument proves ſo much, that indeed it proves nothing at all to the purpoſe: for the final m, together with its vowel, is as much diſregarded by the Latin poets; and eſpecially the final s, which even before a conſonant, was antiently neglected by both Greek and Roman poets: and indeed our Greek aſpiration is frequently in Latin expreſt by s, as ἡμι, ſemi, ἕξ, ſex; and are theſe therefore no letters?

But to proceed: This aſpirate is ſet before all the vowels, as habeo, hebeo, hio, honoro, humeo; but after no conſonant, except the three mutes p, c, t, and that only in words of a Greek original, as philoſophus, chorus, Theodorus. Servius indeed tells us, the ſame uſe had obtained in three Latin words only, viz. ſepulchrum, pulcher, orchus; whereof the two firſt ſeem to have been ſo pronounced by ſome before and in Cicero's time, as he expreſly affirms of pulcher. That this way of prefixing and ſubjoining h to conſonants and vowels was indeed uſed in pronunciation, but condemned by the beſt judges before Cicero's time, Catullus witneſſeth, laughing Arrius to ſcorn Ep. 82, for the affecting to pronounce chommoda and hinſidias. Cicero truly ſoon after, knowing very well that the antients uſed not this aſpirate inſertion, for ſome time uſed to ſay pulcrior, Cetegus, and Kartago, yet ſeems afterwards to have eſpouſed the aſpirate way, at leaſt in ſome words, as judging the ſound more maſculine and ſprightly; for upon that account, as we partly learn from himſelf, but more expreſly from A. Gellius N. A. 2, 3. this cuſtom was introduced. However, this way, though ſparingly, and in few words uſed at firſt, grew into ſuch a ridiculous exceſs, that ſome ſaid chenturiā, chorona, præcho, vid. Quint. Inſtit. Orat. 1, 5. Concerning the intercourſe which h hath with the Æolic digamma, ſee the letter F. H. in the notes of the antients, notes hic, hæc, hoc, honor, honeſtus, hæres, homo, habet, hora; HA. I J.

I i, and in black Engliſh letter 𝔍 𝔦, Latin I i, Greek with little variation Ι ι, all from the Hebrew י. This vowel having the ſmalleſt ſound as well as figure, is moſt fitly ſuited to low poetical images; as in that of Ovid, Epiſt. 1, 109.

Nec mihi ſunt vires inimicos pellere tectis, where you meet with no a, and only once with o and u, but this vowel ſeven times, and the next ſmall ſound e, as it ought, wanting one of that number. But when the ſubject riſeth, as in the ſublime, the frequent uſe of it is to be avoided. For this reaſon Virgil hath in the Æneid writ olli for illi near twenty times, but never in his Eclogues or Georgics. Hence alſo comes the frequent change into u by the antients, to ſtrengthen the ſound, as Juppiter Optumus Maxumus, and many other inſtances which might be given out of the old manuſcripts of Livy, Tully, and Pliny, plainly ſhew. This vowel in Latin compounds is alſo ſubſtituted for a, as abigo, contingo, deficio, from ago, tango, facio. The ſound of this to the next ſmall vowel e is ſo near, that the Hebrew, and other dialects from that tongue, expreſſed them both by one character, before the invention of points, And the changes of i into e, and vice verſâ, in Latin derivatives from Greek, are too obvious not to be obſerved; as in μίνθα, mentha, τέγγω, tingo. Add alſo, that in many words purely Latin theſe vowels are writ indifferently, as mage and magis, here and heri; Mage pollens aër, Lucr. 4, 344. Res hodie minor eſt here quam fuit, Juv. 3, 23. Yea, many words in the accuſative and ablative caſes ſing. of the third declenſion end in em or im, e or i. Alſo in our Engliſh tongue we write indifferently imploy, ingage, incourage, indeavour, or employ, engage, &c. and many other words of the ſame kind. In making Latin diphthongs, as in Greek, this vowel is ſubjunctive to the reſt, as aio, hei, hoi, hui, Ilithyia. In numerals this, as the ſmalleſt letter, is put for the ſmalleſt number, I, one, II, two, &c. and, ſet before the note of a larger number, ſubſtracts it ſelf, as IV, four, IX, nine. In the notes of the antients, I. is put for Inter, intra, Junius, Julius; IA. P. Intra provinciam; I. AGL. In angulo; IA. D. Jam diu, jam dudum; IA. S. D. Jam ſatis dandum; IA. RI. Jam reſpondi.

J j Engliſh and Latin, wanting in the Greek, in Hebrew י, is properly, as the reſt of their letters, a conſonant, and hath a name as ſuch, though in favour of pronunciation they ſometimes uſe it as a vowel. We, in imitation of them, call i and j by one common name, but with this difference, that they give it a name from its conſonant uſe, we from the vocal. We have indeed invented a different figure for the conſonant, which has been too much neglected by old writers and printers. It is pronounced commonly in Latin and Engliſh, and by ſome in Hebrew words, like a ſoft g; but very faultily, except perhaps in derivatives from the Greek ζ, as Jupiter, from Ζεῦ πάτερ, where it may be allowed that harder ſound; its true pronunciation being ſofter, approaching nearer to that of the vowel, as at this day the Germans and other adjacent nations pronounce it; their jahr, and our year being ſounded alike. The true ſound undoubtedly is near to our y before a vowel in the ſame ſyllable, and, if we would follow analogy, this letter ought to be called yé, as we ſay, bé, cé, &c.
